The trend in the Asian markets was largely positive during Q1 and the fund rose almost 7% in SEK. The stock markets in Taiwan and India posted the most strength. Taiwan benefited from the market's continued focus on technology companies, not least those that have some type of association to generative AI. India benefited from the economic growth in the country that is now positively stable after significant fluctuations during and after the pandemic. The profit growth for many companies is very positive.

The stock market in Thailand was the weakest in the region during the quarter. Tourism in the country has not fully recovered after the pandemic, which in turn has held back domestic consumption. The Chinese stock markets also lagged. A number of equities within electric cars and healthcare had a difficult quarter.

The Taiwanese semiconductor company TSMC was the strongest contributor to fund returns. The Chinese gaming company NetEase and the Chinese internet company Tencent were also favorable to returns. The companies rebounded after downturns in December that were a result of proposed new regulations for video games in China. Both companies also presented solid reports during the quarter, which provided support to share price performance.

Indian HDFC Bank had the largest negative impact on performance in the period. The company, which previously had good growth and profitability, is now showing a temporary weakness in key figures during the ongoing integration with HDFC. The Chinese internet company PDD and the regional insurance company AIA had a negative impact on the portfolio's performance.

We have a cautiously optimistic outlook on performance in the Asian equity markets going forward. Economic growth in the region is positively stable and market valuations as a whole are at unusually low levels.
